Tremont - The New York Association's Experiment

"The town of Tremont is rising up as if by magic," announced the Sangamon Journal on April 4, 1835. But it wasn't really magic, of course. It was vision, planning, energy and hard work.

It all started in 1833, when John Harris and Josiah James of New York came to Central Illinois on a prospecting tour. On their way home, Mr. James suggested they gather a group of people to organize a colony. Once in New York, they solicited friends and held a meeting for the interested parties. A committee made up of Harris, James, and William Sampson was chosen to locate land for their new colony. The interested parties agreed. John Harris was chosen as their treasurer and they soon found a spot well-suited to starting a colony.

The New York Association, as it was sometimes called, envisioned a town that would grow in importance. They planned a generous public square in the center of the town and large lots with broad streets and alleys. They determined that there would be a drawing among the colonists for either city or agricultural lots, paying according to the value of the lots. After a while, they had 26-year-old Nathaniel Currier (who later paired with James Ives, as in Currier & Ives,) draw up the village plat map. This can be seen today in the Tremont Museum.

Then in 1834, about 50 enthusiastic people came by wagons to the wide-open prairie to settle the town. With them, they brought some furniture and the bare necessities that would be required. According to The History of Tazewell County, published in 1905, "The colonists...brought with them the culture and spirit of New England..."

Upon arriving here, the colony set about getting things done. Immediately upon arriving, they purchased 14,800 acres of land. The land patents were signed by President Martin Van Buren.

Ads were placed around the state for skilled workers, such as the one above from the Sangamon Journal on April 4, 1835. In the same newspaper, there was a report on the bustling activity in the new town site: "Last week the first house was raised in Tremont. This week seven more were to be raised. Many others are in preparation, and all will be completed as speedily as possible."

Soon, businesses such as a tavern, a wheelwright, a grocery and boot shop, and a cabinet shop, to name a few, began to locate around the public square.

The New York Association had a plan and they vigorously pursued it. A first order of business was to erect a schoolhouse near the corner of S. Walnut Street and S. Sampson Street, and also a church. That same year, they established a U.S. Post Office. William Sampson's brother was named as the first postmaster. The next year, in July, 1836, by a vote of 28 to one, it was decided to incorporate the town.

The state legislature formed a committee to permanently locate the county seat. In 1835, the committee came to Tremont and met with, "the generous and enterprising" John Harris, who offered twenty acres of his own land and relayed that the town would pay $2,000 for the public building. At this time, the revenue for the entire county was less than $1,400! Tremont was awarded the county seat, which had formerly been in several temporary locations in Mackinaw. This decision was met with much joy in Tremont, no doubt, as the Association was determined for the town to be a center of commerce for the county. The men planned a beautiful courthouse square at the end of what would be called Broadway, a wide block at the courthouse square on South James Street. (Note – The early plat map shows Broadway – a grand approach to the courthouse, but for some reason, that never happened.) Work began immediately on a temporary courthouse, until the more elaborate one could be built, which it was, in 1839. Soon, the jail was moved from Mackinaw to Tremont as well, and an addition was built on as a residence for the sheriff.

A railroad would be important to the growth of the new county seat. So, also in 1835, James and Harris were two of the investors in a railway from Pekin to Tremont in this county. But by 1837, the economy had turned, the state was almost bankrupt, and what work had been done on the railroad bed was disbanded. Though there were a few more attempts through the years, no railroad was built through Tremont until 1867. By then, the county seat had been moved to Pekin, where it remains.

From the Sangamon Journal April 4, 1835, "The committee who have conducted the affairs of the Association evinced much judgement in the selection of a location...all members of the company are satisfied and pleased with their prospects. It is said there is not a discontented individual among them, and why should there be? Surrounded by the most lovely country – of unsurpassed fertility – in a healthy and genial climate – in a society of their own choosing - why should they be discontented? The success of this experiment will undoubtedly lead to the formation of similar Associations."

As Illinois was being settled, about one-third of new towns survived. The odds were against the new village, but because of the wise advanced planning by the Association, The History of Tazewell County relates, "No thoughtful person can look back over the history of this community without concluding that few places in Illinois were begun under more auspicious circumstances." Tremont thrived as if by magic.
