Did you know...?

James Knowles Kellogg: Pioneer, Teacher, Mayor 1800-1888

It was meant to be a new and exciting adventure - moving west with a group of fellow New Yorkers. They would be one of the first families to settle a new town on the wild Illinois prairie. But within a year, young James Kellogg and his family would meet with tragedy. The year was 1835, known in central Illinois history for unrelenting rain, high water, and pools of stagnant standing water. James was struck with fever, likely cholera, as was his wife, Mary. Though James recovered, Mary and their unborn child did not. Their grave, in a lovely shaded grove, was the first one in the community.

After two years passed, James traveled back to New York. There he married his late wife's sister, Achsha Fisk. Together, they started a new family on his farm in rural Tremont Township, raising their son Francis and daughter, Anne, both born in 1840. At the age of three, Francis died. Two years later, a daughter, Mary, was welcomed.

James had been a successful teacher when he lived in the East. The first private school in Tremont was built on the southeast corner of the property where the 2004 Methodist church is today. When the school directors learned of his experience as a teacher, James was promptly employed to teach at the school for an annual salary of $350.00. (Other sources say James built the school.)

In an 1841 letter to his father-in-law, James lamented, "My school has done as well as the times would permit, but scarcely anybody pays me anything. I shall abandon the school in the spring and try to collect something."

However, despite his frustrations, he kept the school going. In 1844, an advertisement was placed in the Tremont Whig, a newspaper published on Fridays in the 1840's, listing the subjects offered and the cost for each. The ad ended in this way:

"Special attention given to the moral and social as well as intellectual acquisition of the pupils..."

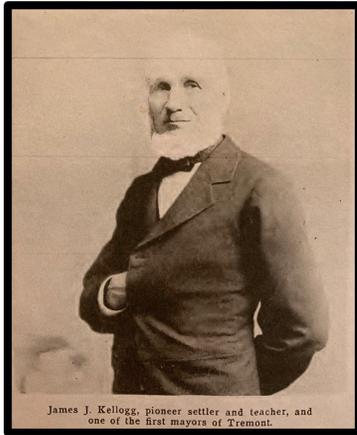

In 1846 another ad appeared in the Tremont Whig:

"The fall term of the Tremont Academy will commence on Monday, October 5th, under the superintendence of J. K. Kellogg. Having recently witnessed the most approved method of conducting similar institutions in the east...having procured apparatus for illustrating the principles of chemistry, national philosophy, astronomy, electricity, and magnetism...a thorough academical institution will not be surpassed by any similar institution in the state."

The 1840's were a time of many private schools. Kellogg's school was held from 1838-1851, making it one of the longest lasting of the time. When it closed, James Kellogg built a house nearby at 213 South Locust Street, and used a portion of the schoolhouse as a kitchen for the residence. In later years, daughter Mary lived there until her death from pneumonia at age 74 in 1924. The home became the new Methodist Church parsonage. Several pastoral families lived in the home until a new parsonage was built on the north side of town. The Kellogg home is owned today by Marilyn Toepfer.

James was an early settler and father who experienced the devastating loss of his wife and two children. He is remembered as a vital part of our early Tremont community. James Kellogg, who also served as a deacon in the Methodist church and as one of our early mayors, educated many of Tremont's first children.

Sources differed on some key details: Did James Kellogg build the private school? Was Anne Kellogg a twin of Francis? Was Anne Kellogg even a daughter to James and Ashcha? There were many spellings of Ashcha's name, as well.
